1. Educational Goals for the Course: This course asks participants to think about classroom management as a way of interacting with students. It suggests that cooperation and enthusiasm for learning are not things that teachers build in students; rather, they are behaviors and attitudes that teachers help students recognize within themselves. The course presents strategies that emphasize helping students discover that they want to be cooperative, active learners. As students figure out that they hold responsibility for their learning and for the classroom climate, however, teachers must remember to regularly investigate how their dispositions and personal experiences influence the classroom culture. Therefore, teacher reflection is always a key aspect of any effective classroom management plan.

   - Investigate sources of power and influence in the classroom.
